The War That Changed The World Five programmes

(3) London: The Psychology of War What did the world's first industrial war do to the minds of people who fought in it?

The third debate of the series comes from The Imperial War Museum in London as we explore the psychology of war. What drove men to volunteer for the war? What drove them to the edge of sanity when they got there? Historian and broadcaster Amanda Vickery is joined by a panel of experts and a live audience to explore the mental impact of fighting the war at home and abroad. World War One experts Dan Todman and Michael Roper are joined by the celebrated cultural historian, Joanna Bourke, who presents her specially commissioned essay, Shell Shock and the Shock of Shells. How does a society recover from war, and what difference does winning or losing make to a psychological recovery? (recorded in The Imperial War Museum in London by BBC)
