6:00 Elements: Nitrogen

We've all heard about the carbon cycle and global warming, but nitrogen is at the heart of another less famous elemental imbalance that could also result in catastrophe. It all began a century ago when a pair of German chemists first cracked the problem of how to split open the inert nitrogen molecules found in the air, opening the way to a seemingly unlimited supply of fertiliser - without which much of the world could not feed itself. Yet their discovery also opened the way to tragedy, death and destruction and a potential environmental Armageddon (BBC)

7:06 Tiny School in Murupara goes global

Total Immersion Maori-Mandarin-Japanese goes global in a tiny rural school. An hour from Rotorua, with only 150 students enrolled, Te Kura Kaupapa Motuhake O Tawhiuau - a new entrant to senior students school in Murupara township - has a total immersion approach to learning Te Reo Maori, Mandarin and Japanese, and they are also going global. With their Mandarin and Japanese teachers and around 10 Mandarin language assistants, they are looking to produce the next generation of global citizens, all under the leadership of their visionary Principal, Pembroke Bird. Lynda Chanwai-Earle travels to Murupara to meet the students of this little school with big dreams, the next generation of global citizens. She finds out why being multi-lingual is the way of the future (RNZ)

11:06 The Byrds: Farther Along

The Byrds, covering 1968 to 1972: The ground breaking country-rock years. We pick up the story in 1968 and detail how the Byrds' legendary Act I was followed by one of rock history's most fascinating second acts. Despite their lower record sales, the Byrds' later incarnations alternately defined and re-defined "country-rock", thanks to the influential contributions by folks like Gram Parsons and guitarist Clarence White (F)
